Reopening A Very Ugly Scandal

PITTSBURG, August 9.—Declaring that he has obtained new letters and other evidence that will prove the charges made against his wife during the notorious trial of his divorce suit, Augustus Martje will ask Judge Robert S. Fraser to reopen the case. Martje alleges that he has nine letters written by Mrs. Mary Scott Martje to "Tom" Martje, the coachman co-respondent.

who disappeared from Pittsburg last week. His attorney, J. Scott Ferguson now is preparing the application to have the case reopened.
It seems certain that Martje has left the country, accompanied by a private detective named O'Neill, employed by Martje. It is declared that before leaving here Martje made an affidavit that he perjured himself during the first trial, and that he has left the country to escape prosecution when the affdavit is used.

In the meantime Mrs. Martje has been forced to move from the Ligonier Springs Hotel, where she was spending the summer with her two children.
She says her life has been made miserable by the hounding of private detectives employed by Martje. She has sought seclusion in Vance cottage in a suburb of Ligonier Springs.

SMUGGLER OF OPIUM IN THE OLD DAYS IS DEAD

WILLIAM A. WHALEY, WHO WAS DEEP IN THE OPIUM SMUGGLING DEALS OF THE MONARCHY IN HAWAII, DIED A PAUPER, AT SEA ON BOARD THE ARMY TRANSPORT THOMAS—HIS HONOLULU WORK AS SMUGGLER.

SAN FRANCISCO, August 17.—The passing of William A. Whaley on board the United States army transport Thomas, who died a pauper while on the homeward voyage from the Philippines recalled to the old officials in the customs house service one of the strongest bands of depredators against the customs revenues that has ever existed on this coast. It will be recalled to the residents of Hongkong and other Oriental cities the dashing "Diamond King," who led a "Monte Cristo" life there during the early nineties.

The "gang" of which Whaley, Ferdinand D. Ciprico and "Champagne Billy" Boyd were leaders flourished from about 1888 to 1892, when Ciprico was sent to San Quentin. Boyd committed suicide while under arrest at Alcatraz. Whaley escaped to foreign lands and lived luxuriously on the proceeds of his operations, an exile from America.

Whaley and Ciprico were in the customs service as inspectors. They were legislated out of office in 1885. There had been ugly rumors of their grafting but both had a "pull" and they were let down easily.

Three years later the custom house officials were astonished at the large number of "Red Eagle" certificates under which the Chinese were being landed and it was traced to the gang of old custom officials. Whaley and Ci-prico were assisted in the work by an interpreter named E. W. McLane, Cl-price was arrested, but the jury disagreed and he was released.

Made bold by its success, the "gang" started in on a more extensive scale.
A room was engaged in the old Wells-Fargo building (afterward known as the Crossley), on New Montgomery and Mission streets. A small printing press was installed and the gang began to turn out the bogus certificates by wholesale.

The scheme was arranged by Whaley and a boating man known as Captain Henry Smith. Smith, who had been on several voyages to the Orient and engaged in the opium trade, arranged for the purchase of the yacht Halcyon one of the fastest vessels in the bay.
Smith commanded the ship and several trips were made to ports in China and the vessel loaded with opium. The drug was landed in British Columbia and on the Hawaiian Islands. There was a duty of $2 a pound on the drug.

The custom house end of the scheme was managed by Inspector William Boyd, a young society man, and the purchase of the yacht and other expenses were met by the outside members of the gang. Three merchants were inveigled into the scheme. They were D. G. Camarinos, a fruit merchant; Thomas, a photographer and Wrightman, a candy manufacturer.
These men financed the scheme.

The profits were immense and the gang grew rich. Boyd was particularly extravagant and was known throughout the Tenderloin as "Champagne Billy," from his penchant for opening bottles of the wine. He also got some local reputation from lighting cigars with five dollar bills, so that his friends could see him "burn money."

It is related that while dining with a friend at Marchand's late one night that she suggested that a bath would benefit her. Boyd ordered the waiter to fill a bath tub with imported champagne and her wish was gratified. It was principally from this incident that Boyd received the name by which he was known.

The last trip of the Halcyon was disastrous. The vessel went ashore on the Chinese coast and the Chinese officials found out that there was opium aboard. The trip was resumed and before being stopped the drug was landed on the Hawaiian Islands. The cargo was a very large one and an immense fortune was made on the trip.

Whaley went to Honolulu to collect the money due from the Chinese merchants. He collected all right, but refused to divide with his fellow conspirators. When Captain Smith went to Honolulu he found Whaley living the life of a Monte Cristo. Whaley did not know him any more and refused to talk business or anything about opium.

Smith returned to San Francisco bent upon revenge, and gave the whole thing away to the Special Agents of the Treasury. Smith was appointed a deputy and work up the case. Whatley could not be arrested as he had left for Hongkong, where he was spending money like a drunken sailor.

Whaley was noted in Hongkong for his extravagant mode of living, but his luck turned against him and the usual result followed. He lost all his money and finally went to Manila, where he eked out a precarious existence.

A few months ago the physicians told him that the end was near. Without money or friends he was dying far from his native country. It was cheaper for the government to send him to America than keep him as a public charge and he was sent to San Francisco on the Thomas as an indigent citizen. He died at sea July 28th.
